Les Couleurs de la Lumière: Paris and Provence

"Magical. That's the word that comes to mind to describe my travels through France last year.

The misty mornings I sketched along the Seine in Paris. The boats that drifted by and the lights that twinkled in the distance along that iconic skyline. Returning to the river at the end of the day to watch the sunset in the City of Lights. All of it was magical. There is something so special about Paris and I always leave with a longing to return. I hope my paintings of the city along the Seine reflect the depth of that love.

And then there were the weeks I spent wandering and sketching my way through Provence. This leg of the trip, guided by maps and serendipity, inspired me to create paintings of a land that has beguiled so many before me. In Lourmarin, where I spent many days sketching in the vast swaths of lavender fields under the luminous, expansive sky, I thought of Albert Camus, who lived there because he, too, loved the immensity of that sky. In the Provençal countryside, I strove to capture the same wonderful clarity of light that so profoundly moved Van Gogh, Cézanne, Bonnard, and countless other artists. Through the red soil, the idyllic villages and ancient hilltowns, the miles and miles of sunlit flower fields, the radiant reds, yellows, purples, all bathed in that special light, I felt connected to this land and the many lives that had crossed it. This, too, was magical."
